

[ANSWERS] Part III “Should You Make the First Move on a Guy?”

Let's start with a reminder.

You could meet Mr. Right anywhere, online or IRL, and I will share two stories of cousins of mine who met their husbands in one-off situations.

Because of this, I want to stress the importance that you CANNOT afford to miss opportunities to meet men.

If they do not work out, then fine.

But when it does work out, it's because you had to meet him, first, right?

And it will have been well worth it, won't it?

Don't think of new men as strangers, instead as men you just haven't met yet.

So, I want to address something that I feel is crucial in your search for true love.

Something even more important than the actual steps to take to meet them.

Mindsets.

Particularly the mindsets that will allow you to conquer fears of meeting new men and not worrying what happens next.

And then I'll touch on a couple mindsets to help you flirt more effectively that tend to get men to chase you from the beginning.

Avoiding (or Limiting) Rejection

One of the many reoccurring patterns I see happening with my subscribers or women I've known or observed personally is that they pay too much attention to his reaction.

And by this, I mean these women tend to be reactionary.

Reactionary women are hopeful that a man reacts in the way they want (likes them and that things go well).

Whereas a woman with an "I'm the prize-to-be-won" attitude.

Or the one who has spent time identifying the compatibility traits that she seeks in a man and will only get serious with a guy until after she spends time with him and he displays these traits will have an easier time protecting her boundaries and not getting emotionally attached.

How?

Because she will more likely be able to detach herself from the Mr. Wrongs- the ones who do not respect her boundaries or do not display the compatibility traits that she seeks.

This is where, for better or for worse, finding your true love comes down to, well, just that, finding him, not making him into Mr. Right.

Think of it like shucking oysters.

Does every oyster have a pearl?

No.

So, what do you have to do to find one that has a pearl?

Um, find one that has pearl.

Your Mr. Right is the pearl.

You have to find the pearl; you can't make it or build it.

Do not allow yourself to fall for the fun, charismatic, charming guy you recently met and then decide that he might be the "One, your Mr. Right.

He could be, or he might not be.

You don't know yet, so don't get all worked up and excited.

Mr. Right will NEVER reveal himself right away.

Let's face it.

How many guys do you think you could stomach dating for a few dates? A few weeks? A few months or perhaps for even a couple of years?

A lot actually.

Because you're not making a lifetime commitment.

It's easy to get excited for the guy that makes your hair stand on edge...
... in the beginning.

(I have a point. Keep reading.)

But until you've spent time allowing the cracks to rise to the surface, you won't really know who a man is yet.

Dating men is YOUR interviewing process.

So, go interview.

But without a creating a list of chemistry AND compatibility traits, you won't know who to "hire".

That's why I recommend that you invest some time on learning how to identify what Mr. Right will look like. Reading "Believe in Love" by dating and relationship coach Evan Marc Katz is a very thorough resource that helps women get back into the dating game by preparing her emotionally and mentally to meet men, opening up her heart to the idea again and re-learning how to engage with men both online and on dates. I highly recommend you read it today. It has helped thousands of women all over the world. Why wait?

[\[Click here\]](#) to get more information on “Believe in Love”

Do not react to man and hope he likes you back.

A sales-recruiter mentor of mine once told me, “He either is or he aint”. You can’t make a man into a salesperson if he doesn’t have some sales talent.

And you shouldn’t focus on hoping that the next guy who likes you and you like him becomes your future husband.

“He either is, or he aint” your future husband.

You’re either meant for each other or you are not.

Enjoy the present time and date the guy.

Let the chips fall where they fall after.

When you think of dating and finding Mr. Right this way, it becomes easier not to invest too much time and feelings on the wrong “candidates”.

Okay, with that said let’s now look at a couple mental fundamentals that allow you be more successful in getting men to chase you so that you can then DECIDE to “hire them or fire them”. 😊

The Flirting Mindsets that Make Men Chase

If you can make the previous mindset become a natural part of you then these too will be easier to make a natural part of you.

Know thy power my queens.

Here are some fundamental flirting mindsets that drive men wild and make them work to win you over instead of the other way around.

“Show Me What Ya Got”

By obtaining the mindset that you are the “prize-to-be-won” and he has to “qualify” to match your needs you challenge to him to prove himself to you.

You want him to strive to “qualify” for you, first as a dating candidate and then later as a relationship candidate.

Superman Syndrome

No man can resist the sensation of feeling like a hero. It feels quite exhilarating to turn a sad woman into a happy one. That’s why I HIGHLY recommend reading a copy of “His Secret Obsession” as soon as possible.

In it, dating coach James Bauer reveals many emotional trigger points that us men share in common that propel us to want to jump at the chance to make a woman feel good.

[\[Click here\]](#) for information on “His Secret Obsession”.

Earning Your Approval

If you protect your boundaries and make him respect you then it becomes natural for you to force men to work to earn the right to advance.

Make them pay for crossing the line. And conversely for us the feeling of a woman bringing down imaginary, protective walls because she’s granted permission to get close to her is one of the most unbeatable feelings us men experience.

Reward him for respecting your boundaries. Train him.

Earning Your Affection

After earning your approval to advance we most certainly want to feel the reward of you expressing your romantic or sexual desire for us, both in touch and in your words. Give him just a taste, but make him work hard for more. Don't get more affectionate until he has proven that he wants what you want.

Getting you to feel AND express your emotions first before he does put us at a MAJOR advantage over you.

Not Being Creepy

No guy wants to feel creepy, especially nowadays with all the weirdo celebrities taking advantage of women (or at least attempting to). If you do not like a guy's approach, then make it known. He WILL want to correct it because it feels awful to be called out. This will cause him to behave. This is a very specific form of earning your approval and respecting your boundaries.

Disapproval

Once you begin to date a man, then now more than ever, he must continue to work to earn your approval. Many of us guys know that women tend to reach an "emotional point of no return" where they fall for a guy so hard that they will put up with inconsistent, rude or even abusive behavior.

It's unfortunate for you. That's why you need to protect your boundaries. He does not want to hear how he has failed you. The right guy will stick around and try to make things right.

If things ever get dangerous than any advice, I have will not be useful. You should at least consider contacting a domestic abuse hotline.

These are just some of the mindsets you need to acquire in order to flirt, find Mr. Right and ultimately, dictate the direction of a relationship.

Or else you risk the ridiculous phrase, "Boy will be boys," becoming a reality.

Demand that a man respect or else many WILL cross the line.

Let's move onto the last part.

What happens when things go well during an IRL interaction with a man, how can you handle exchanging contact information?

Exchanging Contact Information, First Text and Getting A Date

For the sake of making this easier, let's just look at the times when you would give your contact information to the guy.

If he gives you his info, then better yet. Then YOU get to choose what to do next.

But if you give him yours then you can always block him later if you choose.

So, really, it's a win-win.

My Cousin Met Her Husband at a Restaurant

My cousin, who was divorced at the time, and probably had good reason not to trust men, found herself one Sunday morning seated with her parents having breakfast in a Bob Evan's.

Created and provided by Understanding Men Secrets Newsletter via Infidelityfirstaidkit.com[®] for ENTERTAINMENT PURPOSES ONLY. If you seek professional or psychological help or guidance then please contact a clinical professional.

She couldn't help notice the handsome burly, Italian-American guy seated with a friend across the dining room.

After many failed attempts to get him to notice her, she did what most women would never do.

Upon leaving the restaurant she did something you only see in movies.

She wrote down her phone number on a napkin, walked over to the guy, said, "Excuse me, I don't want to interrupt, but I couldn't help but notice you. Here's my number. Give me a call." Smiled, winked and walked out the door.

I can only imagine his jaw-dropped face.

A cute girl leaving us her number on a napkin literally is EVERY guy's dream.

Unless he flat out does not find you attractive (which is slim), he WILL call.

And call he did, and eventually they got married and had kids.

Another Cousin Met Her Husband at a 7-Eleven

Ok, stop it.

Stop thinking my cousins are desperate. Ha, ha.

They're just opportunistic.

I don't know all the details, so I will keep it short.

Simply put, they kept running into each other at a local convenience store, broke into a conversation a few times, and one of them asked the other for their number and it led to dates and then eventually getting married.

In the end, does it matter who gave who their number?

It would have worked out the same.

And the same goes for you.

The bottom line is that you cannot fear giving a man your number because 1) he WILL call and 2) you can always block him.

I somewhat recently had an encounter where I started a conversation with a lady while sitting at a local upscale sports bar.

We both were into the conversation, her body language certainly said so, and then by no surprise she offered me her phone number.

She even asked me to put it in my phone and text her right then and there so that she'd have mine.

Are you looking for more specific details how to prepare yourself to meet men IRL and to stop missing out on these opportunities?

Do you want more details and tips on how to give him the “green light” to come to you or how you can easily start a conversation with a guy IRL?

Or perhaps what your first text should say that you send to him?

Then download my free 120-page eBook Finding Mr. Right IRL.